She entered the Navy in 1998 and after a number of duty station assignments she reported to her current duty station at the Joint Typhoon Warning Center, Pearl Harbor, in 2010 where she is the Command Career Counselor. Petty Officer Bennett is married to Mr. Adam Niesler of Sydney, Australia they have three children; Alexis, Garren and Kenzie.

PROGRAM

Program Chair, Jeff Deer introduced our guest speaker of the day who is also a Rotarian, Dr. Dan White. Dr. White is a veteran of over 36 years in education at the collegiate and secondary levels. He served as Headmaster at three other independent schools in California and Hawaii prior to founding Island Pacific Academy (IPA). He is a past President of the Board of Directors of the Hawaii Association of Independent Schools (HAIS), and has also served on the Accrediting Commission for Schools of the Western Association of Schools and Colleges (WASC). His leadership in education in Hawaii extends to involvement in the development of both a Master's and Doctoral degree program in school leadership sponsored through HAIS and the University of Hawaii. Publication of his 1st Edition of So Help Me God provided Dr. White with the proverbial 15 minutes of fame in his then-home-town of Sacramento as a guest commentator on radio and television during the second inauguration of Bill Clinton.

Dan White earned his Ph.D. in Political Science from the University of California, Riverside, in 1975, authoring his dissertation on the administration of President Dwight Eisenhower.

Walter Cronkite was wrong. That rare occurrence was the genesis of So Help Me God; Becoming the President. By tradition, presidents have placed their left hand, with three exceptions, on a Bible, often opened to a favorite verse.

In 1992, Cronkite reported that no two Presidents had taken the oath on the same verse. In fact, there have been several repeats. Each inauguration, though, has been unique as have been the presidencies of the forty-three men who have served in the nation’s highest office.

So Help Me God: Becoming the President highlights the special qualities of each inauguration and tells, in brief, the story of each administration. Common to all inaugurations has been the oath of office, stipulated in the Constitution in Article Two. Presidents pledge to “faithfully execute the laws and preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States.” Upon completing the oath, the term of office begins. To emphasize the solemnity of the oath, George Washington added “so help me, God.” So Help Me God: Becoming the President tells stories which rekindle faith in the capacity of ordinary people to rise to the occasion to perform extraordinary feats. The stories affirm the belief that the presidential office, created as something new and untested in 1789, fits the values and aspirations of the American vision and its people.

Take the example of our first President, George Washington. As a military commander, in terms of battles won and lost, his record was hardly perfect. Yet Washington was probably one of the better commanders available to the rebellious colonies, and it suited the nation's interests to have the winning general, elected overwhelmingly as the first President, viewed as a successful military man. And, applying today's vernacular, he was the winner in the Big One at Yorktown, the crucial role of the French fleet notwithstanding.

President Pierce provides another example of timely exclusion of fact. Pierce was one of only two Presidents not to use a Bible for his oath of office. John Quincy Adams was the first; for him, it was an expression of his interpretation of the separation of church and state. Pierce's choice of law books derived from his wife blaming the President-elect for the death of their son in a train wreck, and punishment from God for lies Pierce had told his wife about his nomination. She convinced him that using a Bible would be blasphemous. Imagine a New York Times headline in March 1853 shouting "Pierce Fears Blasphemy; Chooses No Bible."

President Lincoln is widely credited for freeing the slaves with the Emancipation Proclamation. The fact that, with a few exceptions, those slaves were in territory in rebellion and thus not actually free until the Civil War was won by the Union does not detract from the powerful myth about Lincoln. Fewer still remember that Lincoln's ideal solution was not a salt-and-pepper society in which white and black lived side by side in peace and harmony. Lincoln advocated shipping the African Americans to Africa, specifically, to Liberia. Once again, there was need for a powerful and positive myth, so the facts were adjusted to fit the need.

Crippled by polio after running unsuccessfully for Vice President in 1920, Franklin Roosevelt arranged with the press never to be photographed in a manner that revealed his inability to use his legs. Once again, the needs of the nation, at that point several years into the Great Depression, for a powerful myth trumped any sense of the public's "right" or "need" to know. Certainly, his physical condition was no secret. But the image of a firm and healthy President contributed to public confidence that FDR was a strong leader who would lead the nation out of the abyss.

What does modern America gain and lose in its supposed desire to know all, all the time? By creating an expectation of perfection in our leaders, the public and the media set up leaders for failure, since no one is perfect, or create the conditions in which leaders feel they must always present "their best foot forward."

We Americans often proudly proclaim that we are a "government of laws and not of men." Indeed, we strive for "equal justice under law," asserting that no man is above the law. We would do well to remember that "men," now to be understood and "men and women," interpret the law and confront the challenges of an unpredictable world. As living, breathing actors making real-life decisions, it is comforting to have the guidance of long-standing Constitutional principles and a history of flexibility about our Constitution when a President is called upon to save it.

President Doug thanked Dan for his presentation and asked him to sign a children’s book “A Child’s Celebration of Hawaii”, by Dr. Gill McBarnet, which will be donated to Aiea Elementary School to promote literacy.
